The people come with baskets or with a newspaper in which to wrap up the bread that is given to them. Men tuck a loat under their coats, and very few carry away their supply openly.

A meek-faced woman of forty years, herh air neatly brushed back and her faded gown as tidy as could be, came timidly forward with a covered basket. Her bright blue eyes were red, as if from weeping. She was Catherine Brennan, of Montague street, a widow with five calidren. She said she had been a scrub-woman, but of late had had very little work, and declared that she had not tasted food since Saturday. She revelved five loaves of rye bread with a look of a tonishment that graduated into one of helpless gratitude. As she whispered her thanks, her voice choked and her eyes filled with tears.
